

Information Behaviors

I regularly peruse Pinterest for outfit ideas and decided that I wanted to try wearing a tie to work. I however have no idea how to tie a tie so I spent a significant amount of time on YouTube watching “How to tie a tie” tutorials. It took multiple videos from different angles for me to get it down.

One of my favorite musicians released an album in early January that I’ve been listening to on repeat. When I decided to look up the music videos on YouTube I realized that instead of music videos, the artist chose to upload text on the history of Puerto Rico for half of the album.

I’ve been wanting to watch Nosferatu for weeks but I don’t watch horror movies in general so I’ve been bothering my poor friend to try and validate my sister’s opinion that I won’t be that scared of the movie. I’ve created a scary scale that I make my friend rank the movie on, and then ask him to try to describe the type of scary category the movie falls into to make sure I can handle it.

I sat through my regular Tuesday work meeting where we discuss our issues with the shared Outlook calendar. We’ve been swapping information to see if anyone has any quick fixes while IT works on the issue. We also take time to compare our calendars to our boss’s master schedule to make sure we aren’t missing any student sessions this week.

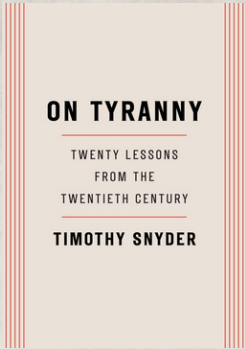

I check the Pinterest app on my iPad everyday to see what the algorithm is recommending on my home page. I’ve been trying to find inspiration for my wardrobe so I’m curious to see what the algorithm recommends based off the photos that I’ve pinned. It’s actually been pretty useful for helping me see how people style pieces in ways I’d have never thought of.

I check the back of my frozen cookie dough to make sure I remember the correct baking temperature even though I do this so regularly I could manage on autopilot.

Information Behaviors

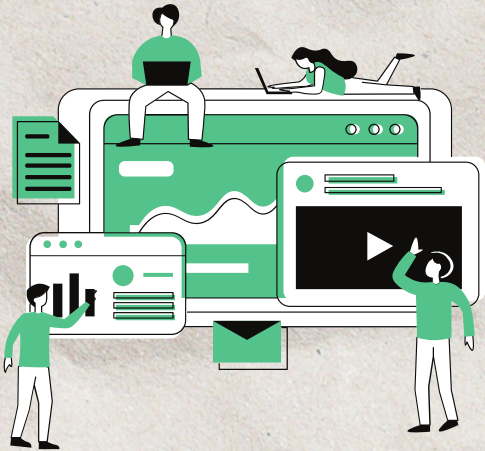

Someone recommends a book to me and I check the reviews online (Amazon, online newspaper, NPR). I think I have a heightened awareness/fear of taking recommendations for books that have anything to do with politics in case they are extremist views. This is a sign of the times, I guess.

I check the Transit app on my phone to see exactly when my bus is coming to take me to work. I like to be able to see exactly how many stops away it is so I know when to start walking to my bus stop.

A faculty member reaches out to ask me to schedule a meeting for “February.” I have to email back and forth to pull more information on what date would be the best for everybody’s schedule.

A faculty member calls me to tell me he’s going to be late to teach class. I need to inform his class.

I recently took over part of a friend’s role at work when she left the university. I’m still digging through copies of her old emails and the Sharepoint site to try to find guidance on what I should be doing/ what was done in previous years to help me adjust.

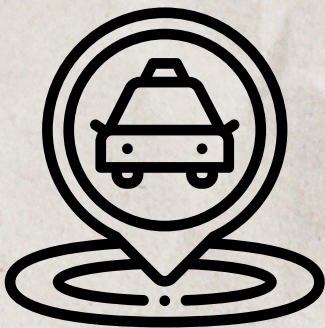

We’re going over new moves in dance class. A lot of people are new this session. I work on the new moves while the teacher goes back to explain the foundation of it to the newer students.

Search

My facial eczema has returned. I spend time figuring out if I can use my prescription topical cream on my face. I can’t.

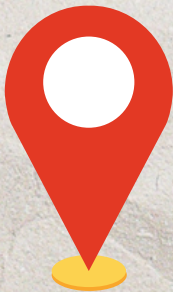

Information Behaviors

I sat in on a Zoom meeting for a medical research data network that I absolutely didn't need to be in, but I did get good insight into how database trainings are organized for students.

My meeting ran late, so I missed the bus to take me to happy hour. I open the Lyft app and try to figure out which pickup time to choose to save money but also make sure I get there at a reasonable time.

My Lyft says I've arrived at the location, but when I get out I can't seem to figure out where to go since I've never been to this bar before and none of the buildings I see look like bars. I open my Apple Maps app to give me a more accurate idea of which direction to walk.

Arrive at happy hour at the National Mechanics to meet with friends I made from class last quarter. The happy hour is fun, and a very low stakes way to get to know everyone outside of class.

After happy hour I rush home because I have a friend that will be sleeping over. We hadn't seen each other in a couple of months so we immediately start catching up when she arrives. She's currently searching for jobs after working on the Harris presidential campaign. I ask how the job search is going. She asks about how I'm doing with my work/school load. We then transition over to providing each other with updates on other friends to compare our information and fill in the gaps for what we know is happening in everyone else's lives.

My friend and I discuss our plans for Saturday. The only thing we really care about deciding on that night is where we're going to have lunch, so we pull up a couple of places we like on Google and decide on a restaurant in Chinatown.